How it all started?

The story begins in England, in the 1980s. It was then, that many people became ill because they eat eggs infected with Salmonella. The eggs were the product of a number of battery farms that kept hens in cages without any room to move, simply used as egg laying machines. The chickens were fed contaminated food and the eggs were infected in turn. This would never have happened if the birds were kept in an environment as near to natural as possible.
